New corporate offices and changing image reflect Kentah's global success

Albuquerque, NM

April 1, 2008

Kentah's market growth leads them to relocate and expand with confidence.

While some businesses are cutting back in this economy, The Kentah Group, a leading IT services company, has moved its headquarters office to new and larger premises at Two Park Square in Uptown Albuquerque.

“The growth Kentah is experiencing has been a direct result of our unique business model and aggressive strategies. Our growing base of private and public sector customers reflects the increasing importance of reducing IT costs and complexity to CIOs today and our IT Service Management offerings are helping CIOs meet those goals,” said Keith Harris, Kentah CEO. “We are also proud this business growth is having a positive impact on our local economy.”

“We were fortunate to locate our new office at the core of the City—many of our employees are making lifestyle changes due to the energy crisis and this office is ideally situated for promoting those changes,” said Stephen V. Wade, Kentah's President.

Mr. Wade further stated, “Our new office is the result of our commitment to providing services that make a difference in the daily working lives of people across America. IT infrastructure is the backbone of every company and governmental agency. Our goal is to help IT organizations optimize investments, reduce IT complexity, and transform capabilities so these entities can achieve greater IT value, which translates to better profits for businesses and more jobs for Americans. We understand our clients are facing challenges of budget pressures, shrinking workforce, demanding end users, and ever-changing technology. At Kentah, we can help them meet these challenges with innovative approaches to their IT services. It's not a sexy business, but one that people use every day without even thinking about it.”
